GROUND ZERO TEXAS

● There's been a new breed of videogame emerging over the last few years: the so-called interactive movie. It started in the arcades with games like Mad Dog McCree. This cobbled together real video sequences to give the player the impression of partaking in a number of wild west gun battles with a bunch of extras from a Willie Nelson video. Then just when everyone was beginning to moan that FMV interactive games were all looks and no gameplay, along came Ground Zero Texas. Combining the shooting gallery aspects of Mad Dog McCree and Lethal Enforcers with FMV plot updates that you actually wanted to watch, no wonder the game has already topped the Mega CD charts.

Hurray For Hollywood

The makers of the game have made much of the fact that producing the game was very similar to shooting any other movie, with a phenomenally high body count. They certainly poached a lot of Hollywood talent to get there. The director worked on Rapid Fire, Halloween 4 and Marked For Death; one of the screenwriters had co-written Robocop; the head stunt coordinator also did his thang on Rambo 3 and Star Trek 2.

Over 300 scenes were shot for the game, totalling around 110 minutes of video footage. Stunts, exploding buildings, fist-fights — everything you expect of a good movie without having to endure cheesey subplots about love or young boys and killer whales or whatever. In fact the makers didn't get much change out of $3 million, mostly 'cos they built a scale model of an alien mothership and 'cos the whole town gets trashed at the end and then there's that huge dance number — but hey, we're giving away the plot.

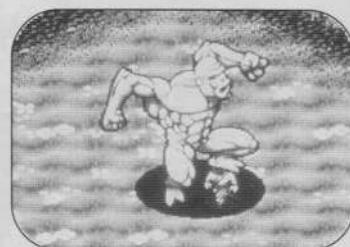

In Texas No One Can Hear You Scream

The story centres around a small town in Texas where a number of mysterious space-alien-type goings-on have been reported. A race of body-snatching aliens called the Reticulans is attempting to set up a beach-head and invade our planet. The real townspeople end up deep frozen in the Reticulan equivalent of Bejams, located somewhere just outside the town with the aliens' weapons cache. You're brought in as some sort of government trouble-shooter, you're holed up in a hotel room with no access to the outside world bar room service and a bank of closed-circuit monitors. Yes, the whole town has been wired for sound and video via a sophisticated defence system; Battlecams, armed security cameras, are set up at four key locations. You have to channel hop between the four channels, toasting anyone you think is related to ET and protecting the Texans.

The action switches between a Lethal Enforcers-style shooting gallery and Full Motion Video sequences where everyday life is played out before you. Thing is, you can't trust anyone — that silver-haired old dear who looks like Ma Walton could be a filthy slimy-skinned reptile under her cardie. Worse still, sometimes the game tries to bluff you; you'll see some shifty-eyed bloke who's in fact totally innocent but who couldn't look any more like a disguised alien if he wore deely boppers and gave the vulcan salute. 'Course by the time you've discovered the truth, you've usually shot him, and then head agent Rees comes in and punches your lights out — bloody liberal.

Dirty Pillows

From the early levels it would seem that the undercover uniform of the imperial Reticulan storm trooper is a Wonderbra and Daisy Duke-style Hotpants — most of the baddies are well-upholstered young ladies. Later you get equipped with the techy sounding Rovercam, which is a Battlecam mounted on some sap's hat, and wander around caves looking for the aliens' arms dump. Here you'll find the aliens in their natural form; butt-naked, slimy, green, Godless and yucky. Lastly the town gets invaded by storm troopers in full battle armour. Shoot them here, and they explode in a 15-rated shower of green blood and sweetbreads. Brill! ●

FLASHBACK

● From the moment it first appeared, Flashback received the sort of attention usually only reserved for a UFO sighting at a Royal Wedding officiated by Take That. The game topped the charts on every format it appeared on, and recently Sony have released the Super Nintendo version. French gaming boffins, Delphine, have managed to combine the best elements of an adventure — finding and using objects, gleaning clues by logging on to computers and talking to people you meet, and lots of lateral thinking — with the more immediate thrills of the action game — loads of leaping about and ultraviolence.

They've Got Major Too

The plot's really well thought out and cribbs ideas from many of the best sci-fi flicks of the last few years. The game begins with Conrad escaping baddies and crash-landing in an alien jungle unable to remember how or why he's there. Now we've all been there, so let's not get all judgemental, suffice to say that as the game progresses the background to the story unfolds. It turns out that Conrad is some sort of agent who stumbled across a secret society of alien infiltrators who've taken key posts in the world's governments. Before he can blow the whistle and call the Cook Report, he gets rumpled and ends up kidnapped and subjected to a memory-wipe on the planet Titan. His adventures take him back to Earth and then on to the bizarre home world of the Aliens, battling with aliens, automatic defences and even the filth on the way.

I Can Work, I Will Work

You'll often get some wrinkly old grown-up having a go because games don't teach youngies the skills that they'll need in later life — well, it's not so with Flashback. Conrad has to find gainful employment to get the money to return to Earth. He tries his hand as a bodyguard, delivery man, bounty hunter and bomb disposal expert, just the sort of stuff you find on the boards of your local Job Club, but without all the shelf stacking. There's even that staple of most sensible people's career plans: the chance to win a wad as a TV game show contestant. Except, of course, that this show makes Gladiators look about as anarchic and dangerous as The Food And Drink Programme's Christmas Quiz. ●

EQUINOX

● Platform games — what a drag, eh? Two-dimensional and viewed from the side, they have a limited gameplay and are for the most part a bit of a snore. In the old days, when owning Spectrum was de rigueur amongst the wild boys of the newborn computer games industry, a lot of games used a perspective called '3D isometric'. The game is viewed as if from the top corner of a room, allowing programmers to easily give the impression of 3D without lots of clever programming tricks. Or something like that anyway. It's probably something to do with angles. Anyway, the point is it's really easy to create the impression of 3D objects using simple building blocks, and just as easy to move the blocks about and stack them up on screen. Hence games can be created using clever 3D puzzles that stretch your spatial awareness skills to the limit.

Ultra Vixen

Equinox updates those 3D glory days for the Super Nintendo. The role-playing adventure game came out in Japan last year and has only just come out here. You play Glendaal, a warrior and a wizard despite being a bit of a hopeless shortie. Embarking on a quest to save his dear old dad from the evil ultra-vixen Sonia, ahead of him lie eight different dungeons comprising of a total of 450 separate rooms. Each of these is a chamber of horrors packed with lethal traps, vicious villains, and those fiendishly difficult 3D puzzles featuring blocks, conveyor belts and nasty spiky bits.

Nipples

Each of the eight dungeon complexes has a totally different style: from the shipboard shenanigans and shivering timbers aboard the Galleon, to the permanently nippy Ice Palace where brass monkeys fear to tread and bare-chested Glendaal ends up with nipples you could take an eye out on. There are goodies galore to be found by poking about: potions, yummy tuck and loads of different keys. There's also magic scrolls, and lots of smart weapons which let you show off your Beni Hana skills of bladesmanship. Equinox has drawn comparisons with the Anime-style adventure and benchmark RPG Zelda and has already been hailed as the biggest game of the year — thank the good lord it's got a battery-backed RAM, otherwise you could spend the better part of your adolescence playing it. ●

SKYBLAZER

● Take a look at the fantasy adventure Skyblazer, the graphics and animation, the characters and plot, and you can't help but notice all the heavy Manga influences — no surprise, considering the game's Japanese origins. The story pits the young warrior Skyblazer against Ashura, the evil Lord Of War, in an effort to rescue arch-babe Arianna. It's all very heavy on the mysticism and Eastern promise, so suffice to say you play Skyblazer and there are armies of beasties out there to punch your face through the back of your head.

Gameplay Horn O' Plenty

As well as loads of different variations on the platformy and beat 'em up themes, the game has drawn on all the best bits from a number of the classic games. Remember that game Space Harrier? It was huge in the arcades and featured a natty 3D flying perspective; well, Skyblazer's got a sub level just like it. Then there's a couple of levels which borrow from the innovative platformer Nebulus; Skyblazer has to ascend a cylindrical tower by hopping from platforms located at various points on its outside. To make things harder, some platforms appear periodically, some move about, and some contain hidden foot-long spikes which wreak havoc with Skyblazer's bunions.

Sounds Like A Winner

Not only does Skyblazer boast some stunning graphics, it's also got some of the best sound ever in a SNES game, and atmospheric ditties tha mix Japanese restaurant music with thrash metal. There's a constant stream of noise as Skyblazer duffs up his foes; brilliant samples from Fists Of Fury-type chop-sockey flicks, and satisfyingly guttural Monica Seles-type grunts as he hands out knuckle sandwiches. Smart, eh?

Sunny Spells

And yes, Skyblazer's got all those magic powers seen in the comic, including ...

Power Flash: This is useful for ramming enemies or zipping across a room from wall to wall without touching the floor — handy if the floor is covered with boiling lava or if the carpets have just been shampooed.

Stop Time: Freezes all enemies allowing Skyblazer to wander about at his leisure duffing them up, going through their wallets, and stripping them naked and posing alongside them for photos.

Warrior Force: Makes Skyblazer invincible and turns him a lovely golden colour that makes him look like the Lurpak Butter Man in his Sunday best. ●
